

Time to restore trust in politicians: AMPLIFY

AMPLIFY CEO Georgina Harrisson is calling on the re-elected Labor Government to restore trust in politicians by bringing forward ambitious policies to tackle the pressing problems our nation faces.

A recent AMPLIFY survey, conducted by YouGov, found Australians believe politicians were more focused on winning votes than solving challenges during the election.

The survey found 72 per cent of respondents believed politicians were mostly focused on winning votes. Only 5 per cent believed politicians were mostly focused on solving challenges.

“Australians clearly want leadership that prioritises outcomes over optics and, there is a real opportunity for the government to show they are focused on solving challenges rather than winning votes,” Ms Harrisson said.

“In the weeks since the election the Prime Minister has expressed a willingness for ambitious policies and to work across the political spectrum, which is very positive.

“We look forward to working with all MPs across the political spectrum to find common ground on the issues that matter to Australians.”

The survey also found 67 per cent of respondents were concerned about US politics and its potential negative impacts on Australia.

“Australians are not interested in following the US but they also don’t want divisive politics on either the left or right side of politics,” Ms Harrisson said.

“What they want is for the government to tackle the issues facing our nation through bold and meaningful reforms.”

Cost of living was the biggest issue for Australians at the election. The YouGov poll found the cost of food and groceries was the top issue for respondents with 46 per cent ranking it as the number one issue in terms of cost of living.

This was followed by concerns about the cost of mortgage and rental payments. with 24 per cent saying it was their biggest issue.
